CHAPTER XIII Oxford's Welcome To Bindle I AT three o'clock on the following day the down platform at Oxford station presented an almost gala appearance. Not only were the men of St. Joseph's there, but hundreds of undergraduates from other colleges, with rattles, whistles, horns, flags, and every other attribute of great rejoicing. Outside the station was a carriage with four horses, a piebald, a skewbald, a white, and another horse that seemed to have set out in life with a determination to be pink. Tom Little had himself selected the animals with elaborate care. A little distance away, standing in groups, was a band clothed gorgeously in scarlet and gold tunics and caps, and nondescript trousers, ranging from light gray to black. Tom Little had given careful instructions that as soon as Josiah Williams should emerge from the station, the band was to strike up See the Conquering Hero Comes, and they were to put into it all they knew. If they produced a really good effect they were to have unlimited beer. Reginald Graves stood in the center of the platform, some of the leading spirits of St. Joseph's keeping a clear space so that the meeting between uncle and nephew might be dramatic. A more wretched-looking nephew of a millionaire uncle never existed. Round him were scores of men with cameras, whom Graves instinctively knew to be newspaper men; and perched high above the crowd occupying...
