Reports submitted to the Commission show that many companies included the expenses of farm, turpentine, box, and other enterprises with the cost of their lumber operations, while other manufacturers inflated their costs by the inclusion of interest and a profit on stumpage in their cost of producing lumber. In some cases stumpage was charged into costs at such a high figure that the entire timber account was written off long before the end of the cut, while the remaining timber was charged into cost during 1917 and 1918 at the then estimated current market value. 2. The average rate of earnings on the entire business, as reported by 143 identical companies, was 9 per cent in 1917...
