In short, it is a portion of the great political struggle of our century--the struggle between property, be its amount small or great, and mere numbers. Whether this particular measure will at once place property under the control of numbers, or whether one more advance will be necessary to complete the process, is a point upon which men will form different opinions according to the interpretation they place upon the fragmentary statistics of the Government. But no one who has studied the present balance of political forces can doubt that, if this Bill passes, the same goal will still be reached, whether the journey is performed in one stage or in two. If the democratic power is strong enough now to make resistance a matter of the utmost difficulty, it will be utterly irresistible when this Reform Bill shall have brought in a huge contingent of democratic votes. This is, therefore, the decisive battle of the long campaign--not because the assailants will win by it all they hope to gain, but because when this position is carried, and this reinforcement obtained, the disparity of force will be so great that all further resistance will be hopeless. But there is one strange feature about this struggle. It is fought for objects which deeply concern all who, by their own industry or by inheritance from others, have property to lose; and by all thoughtful politicians its course is watched with an intensity of...
