In some waters several milligrams per liter are found, but those in which more than 10 milligrams per liter of the element are encountered are very uncommon. Most other salts are present in natural waters in amounts many times as great as the salts of manganese. These conditions eliminate some of the accurate standard gravimetric and volumetric methods for the determination of manganese. If they are used, under most conditions, large volumes of water must be evaporated in order to procure a sufficient quantity of the element for determination. In complete analysis of the mineral content of water samples these procedures may not be seriously objectionable, but in rapid work, such as the analytical control of a manganese-removal plant, they would be wholly impracticable. Several water analysts have recommended volumetric or gravimetric methods for manganese. Luhrig and Becker¹ report satisfactory results in applying Knorre's² persulphate peroxide method to the determination of manganese in water. If the water contains less than 10 milligrams per liter of manganese, however, they state that it must be concentrated by evaporation. Klut³ also recommends the same method for waters whose content of manganese is more than 10 milligrams per liter. He states, however, that 5 to 10 liters of the sample should be used. Prescher⁴ recommends that the manganese be precipitated with potassium chlorate from a one-liter sample as manganese dioxide after concentration with nitric acid. The precipitated manganese dioxide is...
